How Much Does In Home Care Cost

Walk through any nursing home, and your first thought might be: "I need to take care of Mom myself." Few people want to turn over a loved one to institutional care. No matter how good the nursing home, it may seem cold and impersonal — and very expensive. But making the choice to provide care yourself is fraught with financial risks and personal sacrifices. It is true that most, if not all, seniors would rather live at home. That is mostly because this sort of arrangement gives them the kind of freedom and independence to which they have grown accustomed. It also has the added advantage of keeping them within familiar surroundings, which is excellent for seniors who are slowly losing the gift of sight and might be suffering from degenerative brain diseases such as Alzheimer's. But despite all these advantages, aging adults cannot live alone in their own homes as they need long-term care. At least, not without assisted help. That is why most families choose to hire in-home care for their beloved seniors. As you can imagine, there is discussion about just how affordable the cost of care really is and how many people can afford it. Today, we will try to break down the cost of in-home senior care and show that it is not as expensive as most people tend to think it is at all and is much cheaper than respite care in a nursing home or receiving residential care.
