How much money should you spend on rent

Moving out of your old place is one of the most exciting parts of becoming an adult. However, with this comes a lot of added responsibility. Part of this duty is knowing and understanding your budget — so how much should you really spend on rent? Based on a blog by: bit.ly/2HTcmtx

How Much To Spend On Rent, Based On Income

"The goal should be: No more than one-third of your income should be going to housing. Ideally, it's even less." » Subscribe to CNBC Make It.: cnb.cx/2kxl2rf Whether you rent or own, housing is likely your biggest expense. Still, you shouldn't spend more than 35% of your annual income on housing, says bestselling author and co-founder of AE Wealth Management David Bach. If you rent, that includes utilities and any broker fees you had to pay. If you own, it includes other costs like mortgage interest, property taxes, maintenance and renovations. And if you want to think about things in terms of gross income, rather than after-tax income, aim to spend less than 30 percent on housing costs. Another popular guideline people follow is the "28/36 rule," which says that you should spend no more than 28 percent of your gross monthly income on housing costs and no more than 36 percent on total debt, including housing and other debt like student loans or car loans. Mortgage lenders use this rule to assess your borrowing capacity. If your debt-to-income ratio exceeds these limits, you may have to pay a higher interest rate or you might not be able to get a loan at all. While these guidelines can be helpful, everyone's financial situation is different. If you don't spend much on entertainment or transportation, you may have more room in your budget for housing. Plus, "it really depends on where you live," says Bach. If you're living in a big city, it may be impossible to keep your housing costs at or below 30 percent. In New York City, residents put nearly two-thirds of their income towards rent, often because they don't have any other choice. If you're looking to retire early or have other ambitious savings goals, you may want to downsize and spend well under the 30 percent threshold. That's what one Chicago-based couple did: By spending less than 15 percent of their income on housing, they managed to bank $50,000 in just one year. To figure out how much you can afford to spend on housing, keep these guidelines in mind, look at your budget and consider your long-term saving goals. How Much Should I Budget For Rent

A question we get frequently is how much should people really budget for rent? What's fair and reasonable, especially given the cost of living of some cities in the United States like Los Angeles, San Francisco, and New York? To answer this question, Adam and Nick actually pose a few questions back to our Explorers, since how much budgets for rent and housing costs is so unique to individuals, couples and families. What types of amenities are important to you, if at all? Are there other priorities in your life outside of living location or condition? The standard rule of thumb is a % of net income, but even that suggests that with a higher income, you should budget more for rent, even though that may not be the best recommendation. Listen in on this episode and walk away being able to truly answer for yourself what's important to you when it comes to your humble abode and how much you should budget for it. masteryofmoney.lpages.co/zero-based-budget/ Download your FREE Zero-Based Budget here: masteryofmoney.teachable.com/p/financial-flow Check out our Financial Flow Course here: masteryofmoney.teachable.com/p/financial-flow Subscribe to our channel if you want more information on money and mindset: youtube.com/channel/UCfgg-I_CJ5TS8PvBJEenOIQ/featured Mastery of Money is a financial education platform that offers programs, courses, and content that make a difference!
