How Much To Save for a House | How Much Should I Save for a House While Renting? UPDATE: We did make our April Student Loan Payments as I mentioned in the video - I am on auto pilot with bills, but I will likely save the next 5 months of payments. All Federal Student Loan payments have been suspended for the next 6 months- I recommend you use these suspended payments to build your savings if all your financial needs are taken care of. This does not apply to Private Student Loans - you need to call any private student loans directly to see what forbearance options are available. How To Save For A House (Plus EVERYTHING else you'll need to know)

Lets get back to the basics in terms of saving enough for a down payment to buy real estate, what you'll need for lenders to give you money, and some things to prepare for before you start buying a house. Enjoy! Add me on Instagram/Snapchat: GPStephan Learn my exact strategies to help grow your career as a real estate agent to a six-figure income, how to best build your network of clients, expand into luxury markets, and exactly what you can do to begin taking your career to the next level...these strategies took me to $120,000,000 in sales volume: goo.gl/UFpi4c Join the private Real Estate Facebook Group: facebook.com/groups/therealestatemillionairemastermind/ It begins with the following: Good credit - Anything above a 740 generally gets the best rates. 2 years worth of tax returns - This shows that your income is consistent and that you've built up some work history. Bank Statements and proof of income for the last 2-6 months - this way you can prove how much money you're actually making and spending. With that, they can calculate what your debt to income ratio is - banks prefer those who save a lot, and spend very little. Cash reserves - sometimes it can be 3-6 months of mortgage payments, taxes, insurance, and a buffer in liquid cash or assets. Pretty much any time you buy real estate, you'll need a down payment. Banks want to see that you have your own money at risk when you buy a house...this down payment forms your initial equity in the property. Generally 15-20% down is about what I'm seeing. If you don't put down 20%, you'll generally need to pay PMI which stands for private mortgage insurance. This is an extra cost that helps assure the bank you'll be making your payments, since the less money you have in the deal, the higher the risk is that the bank will lose money in the event you foreclose. If you can qualify lower down payments and the numbers make sense, go for it. But in more expensive markets, you're going to need more money down. Some other options might be available like a VA loan where you can buy with 0% down - so this will be up to you figure out what'll be best. When saving for a property, it's really about setting your priorities and deciding what comes first - if buying a property is your number one priority, it might make sense to cut back in other areas just for the sake of accomplishing this. What I use that helps a lot is Mint.com and PersonalCapital.com - I use these to track all of my expenses. You need to know where every penny is spent and exactly how much you earn. It'll be nearly impossible to save as much as you can without doing this. One other strategy I like to use is to automate my savings. I have one bank account where all of my money is deposited and saved - this is Ally Bank. Then I have a Bank of America account for my expenses. I'll only transfer a certain amount of money every month to bank of America, this means that everything else I have is pretty much already stashed away. Finally, generally banks won't want the mortgage payment to exceed about 44% of your total income after expenses. Again, with this, it's all cutting back as much as you can. You really have to make this a priority to save as much as you can. Now for those who just don't earn much money in the first place, the reality is that you'll need to either cut back on your expenses as much as you can and save the difference - or work to increase your income. There's no way around it, there's no way to sugar coat this - if you're not earning enough money, you'll need dedicate yourself to making more money. This is one of those things where if you want it bad enough, you will somehow find a way to make it happen. Now one more thing I do when it comes to saving is to keep it all in a high interest savings account. Most people want to invest it, although in the short term, there could be too much volatility to risk it in the markets. Ultimately, when saving up for a down payment, it really just comes down to income vs expenses - and once that's handled, banks will look at the bigger picture to determine what you'd be qualified to receive. And patience and discipline here goes a long way - you will need to do this long term consistently. How Much House Can You Afford (Follow The 3-30-10 Rule)

Rainbow Blvd # 270 Las Vegas, NV 89103 How much house can I afford to buy? That's a very good question that has several different answers. The median household income in 2019 was the highest it's ever been at $68,703. The most recent home prices data shows that in the second quarter of 2020, the median purchase price for a home was $313,200. That means people are spending roughly 4.5 times their yearly income on a home which is just about at the top of affordability scale. So the value of homes has been increasing faster and faster. There's 2 major reasons for it. The first reason is the supply. The last time we've had this low of an amount of homes for sale was in 2003. The second reason is because how low our interest rates are. They are lower than the real estate crash of 2008. In the last 50 years interest rates have been going lower. Now everyone can afford to buy more house. But how much money should you spend on a home and how much can you afford? There's 2 main answers: First, take your monthly income, and multiply it by 0.28. Using myself as an example, I was making $50,000 a year before YouTube, that equates to about $4,167 a month. I would take that and multiply it by 0.28 which gives me roughly $1,167 a month. As long as my monthly payment doesn't exceed that amount, I should be able to afford a house that falls within that range. That happens to be around 5x my yearly salary for a total home price of $250,000. If you want to have a higher chance of getting approved for a loan, the payment for your house, including your total debt - should not be more than 36%. This is called the DTI (debt to income ratio). Add up all the debts, including the mortgage, and divide it by your gross income. If the result is 36% or less, you should be able to get a loan. The second method for calculating affordability is different than the first. This one uses the 3/30/10 rule for all the personal finance investor enthusiasts. You have to follow all three rules and if you cannot, you have to follow at least 1, otherwise you shouldn't be buying the house even if you can technically afford it, you're increasing your risk which is especially bad in times of uncertainty. Rule #1 is 3. That means you should not be spending more than 3 times your annual income. So if you make $100k per year, in theory, you should not spend more than $300k on your home. I realize that this rule is extremely hard to follow if you're living in a high cost of living area like San Francisco or New York City. In some cities across the US, buying a house for 3 to 5 times your annual income is impossible at this point. Rule #2 states should have at least 30% of the home purchase price in cash. All this rule does, is lower our payment and tempt us away from selling if our homes lose value. That means to set aside at least 20% as a downpayment so you can get rid of the PMI which is called private mortgage insurance. This is something our lender forces us to buy into to protect their money from the risk of us defaulting or foreclosing - and for all intents and purposes - it's literally throwing money away. You should also save the other 10% for random costs like repairs. Rule #3 states you should spend no more than 10% of your gross income, that's income before you pay your taxes on a mortgage. For the average person, it's recommended to be around 28% but if your monthly payment can stay under 10% then you're going to save and retire a lot faster. There's really only 3 ways you'll be able to do this. Either make a lot more money than the average person or buy a lot less house. Or you can do what I did and just rent a part of your house. The perfect mortgage size for people to get into if you can afford it is $750,000. That's because of something called the HMID - the home mortgage interest deduction which allows us to itemize and deduct mortgage interest paid on up to $750,000 worth of principal, on either our first and/or second home. *None of this is meant to be construed as investment advice, it's for entertainment purposes only.
