Home Inspector Training Advice

Today I'll share my advice on how to become a home inspector. I blogged on this topic back in 2011, and again in 2016, but things change and it's time for another update. I'm writing this because I get a ton of phone calls and emails from people who want to get into the home inspection business. Instead of sharing the first thing that comes into my head during these conversations, I'm putting down all of the most frequently asked questions right here.

Building inspectors' role is important because they are the ones who ensure that buildings are compliant with the law, specifically the building code. They approve or disapprove, and are in charge of flagging violations. Should you be a building inspector? Let me help you decide by answering the following questions: What is the average salary of a building inspector? What is the job market like for building inspectors? Would it be hard for you to get a job? Would this occupation be compatible with your personality and interests? What kind of education do you need to become a building inspector? Let's get started. Building inspectors review construction plans and approve the ones that don't violate the building code, and they visit the construction site to make sure that everything is going according to the plan that was indeed approved by them. They also check if the materials used are safe and of standard quality to avoid problems in the future. They would be held liable if something unpleasant happens, especially if it's caused by something that they should've checked before the construction began. A college degree isn't required if you want to be a building inspector. However, there are some employers that require a bachelor's degree in a related field, like engineering and architecture. One thing is for sure, though. You will have to gain relevant experience before you are allowed to be one. According to the Occupational Information Network, among the building inspectors: 35% have a post-secondary certificate 35% have an associate's degree 22% have a high school diploma 8% of them either have a bachelor's degree, have a graduate degree, or have undergone further training.
